This volume contains ten addresses delivered by the late Professor of Music in the University of Cambridge and Principal of the Royal Academy of Music and two lectures, one on the Lyrical Drama and one on Handel and Bach. The addresses are those which he de-livered to the pupils of the institution over which he presided on the opening of the Academical years from 1873 to 1857 inclusive, and are more likely to be preserved as souvenirs of one who for many years represented Great Britain's loftiest attainment in the department of musical science and admired for the elegance of their style than seriously valued for the contributions which they make to contemporary

In the personal and artistic character of Sir George A. Macfarren there was much that was admirable and that brought dignity to the institution with which he was connected as pupil, professor and principal through the greater portion of a long and exceedingly

The steadfastness with which he held up classic models and high aims to his pupils, and the lovely enthusiasm with which be always speke of the universally accepted law-givers in his art prove him to have been a man of most serious purpose. It is impossible, however, for a thoughtful and discriminating server to escape the conviction that he put a great obstacle in the way of his influence by adhering stoutly to a conservatism so hide-bound that it seemed based on a willing and intentional ignorance of the character and purposes of the modern school. It is indeed ssing strange that any one aspiring to the leadership of musical thought in this decade should be willing to exhibit such a short-sighted conception of Wagner's aims and the means which he used to attain them as mark the inaugural address of 1883, and the lecture on the Lyrical Drama printed in this volume. In the address, which was the first after the death of Richard Wagner, that composer is spoken of as one "whose genius has been misapplied, and whose works are to be studied rather in the sense of what to avoid than what to follow."

There may be a sense in which it would be possible to enforce such a lesson as this, but that the speaker was far from appreciating It is evident enough from the circumstance that of the three things which he condemns in Wagner's art greatest stress is laid upon his orchestration, which Sir George finds utterly devoid of all variety, except that "which is made by striking more forcibly or less forcibly, on the pianoforte—of loud and less loud—but the constancy of the same tone of brass and reed instruments prevails from beginning to end, and with such indistinctness of part-writing that, when the music has been committed to memory by a listener, he cannot, in many instances, trace the elements of the Mozart was Sir George's model in the treatment of instruments. Sir George A. Macfarren died n the last day of last October. He has been succeeded as principal by A. C. Mackenzie, whose liberality promises a new era of usefulness to the Royal Academy. How different his views are on the subject just reed to may be guessed from some recent utterances. In his first inaugural address Dr. Mackenzie said that while he was not likely to forget to take the orchestra through the orchestral works of the great masters in nusic, he meant to put before them some examples of nodern work with which he wished them to become familiar. There were some works by Raff, Brahms and Dworak which would answer his purposes at present; and future choice would be governed entirely by the growth of their ability to master the practical diffi-culties as well as to understand the intellectual qualities of those compositions with which sooner or later they must form an intimate acquaintance. He wished to give all the students an ample opportunity of studying the scores of the masters, ancient and modern.
